

The urban drilling site, center, is located around residential areas. (RNS/Google Maps)

Heather Morrison

View Author Profile

Religion News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Los Angeles — June 4, 2019

Share on BlueskyShare on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

After years of advocating by community and faith organizations, the city of Los Angeles is officially requiring an oil and gas company to close and clean up a neighborhood drill site.

"It's one of the closest sites to residential homes within the whole city," said Niki Wong, director of policy and organizing at Redeemer Community Partnership, a local faith group. "You can literally place one hand on a bedroom window and another hand on the drill site wall."

The site on Jefferson Boulevard, near the University of Southern California, is 130 feet from a church and 730 feet from an elementary school, according to Stand-L.A., a local environmental coalition that includes faith-based groups.

The decision to clean up the site came after Redeemer Community Partnership learned in August that Sentinel Peak Resources, according to the Los Angeles Times, planned to shut down the facility.

Owners told the city they were preparing the site for another use "yet to be determined." That left organizers feeling uneasy about the future.

The nonprofit began working to make sure the closure and cleanup are done in a timely manner and that the site isn't left as an "orphan well," abandoned by the company.

"They're very toxic, industrial sites. They operate in a way that requires a lot of chemicals," Wong said. "There have been so many people that have gotten sick."

The Jefferson Street oil drill site in Los Angeles will be closed and cleaned up after years of social pressure. (RNS/Bob Smietana)

City officials found "there was sufficient evidence that the operator intends to abandon the oil drilling facility."

"Also, it was discovered that there remain ongoing nuisances from the oil drilling operation," the city said in its ruling.

With the May 30 ruling and the passing of the appeal date on Monday (June 3), the company will have 36 months to close and clean up the land properly.

But it's not the only drilling site Redeemer Community Partnership and Stand-L.A. are fighting.

A rally in September focused on the AllenCo drilling site and promoted legislation for a 2,500-foot buffer between extraction sites and homes.

Related: Neighborhood fears renewed oil drilling at site leased from LA Archdiocese

All members of Redeemer Community Partnership live in these neighborhoods they're fighting for, Wong said.

"Jesus commands us to love our neighbor," she said. "We really see it as our mission to bring the kingdom of God to this little space in South LA as best we can."

In three years, Wong said, members of the community are hoping the old Jefferson Boulevard facility will be transformed into affordable housing, a library or a park.

"People just want it to become something that will benefit the community," she said.

Advertisement