

News

An artist's rendering of the exterior of the new monastery for the Cistercian Nuns of Valley of Our Lady Monastery (Courtesy of the Cistercian Sisters)

by Dan Stockman

View Author Profile

dstockman@ncronline.org

Follow on Twitter at @danstockman

Join the Conversation

December 16, 2019

Share on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

A multimillion-dollar capital campaign is a challenge when the fundraisers' way of life requires isolation from the outside world and the people who fund the campaign.

But the Cistercian Nuns of the Valley of Our Lady Monastery in Prairie du Sac, Wisconsin, a cloistered, contemplative order, say God is up to the task as they enter the second year of their fundraising campaign for a new monastery.

"It's really stretching us," said Sister Mary Bede, the Cistercian sister designated to talk about the project. "Our life by God's design is hidden, so while it's not a challenge for God, for ourselves, it really is a challenge. But grace is always sufficient, no matter what the challenge is."

Cistercian sisters arrived in Prairie du Sac from Switzerland in 1957 at the request of Madison Bishop William O'Connor and moved into a "temporary" conglomeration of buildings that they still live in.

A Cistercian nun prays in the current Cistercian Nuns of Valley of Our Lady Monastery in Prairie du Sac, Wisconsin (Courtesy of the Cistercian Sisters)

In early 2000, with the 50th anniversary of the community's arrival approaching, they began working toward relocation. A capital campaign from 2004 to 2008 paid for initial design work and the new property and gave them a start on the current campaign, which began in October 2018.

Plans call for a two-phase project totaling up to $20 million. Phase one, estimated at $10 million to $12 million, would build living quarters, an altar-bread workshop, and a temporary chapel and guest quarters. Phase two, estimated at $6 million to $8 million, would build a church and guesthouse.

Sister Bede said the capital campaign for phase one is about halfway to the goal.

"We're making progress, but it's slow," she said. "God alone knows the timing, but we would love to finish that campaign in the next year or so."

That would allow the design phase to move forward and for construction to begin in four or five years.

The sisters could not build on their current property because there isn't enough room for the new building, and an influx of vocations — there are now 22 nuns — has put it at capacity. In addition, new housing developments and a busy highway are encroaching on their silence and solitude.

An artist's rendering of the proposed interior of nuns' rooms for the Cistercian Nuns of Valley of Our Lady Monastery (Courtesy of the Cistercian Sisters)

The new monastery, the sisters say, will promote their contemplative, cloistered way of life and be a witness to every facet of their Roman Catholic faith, which is built around liturgy, manual labor and the search for God through deep contemplative prayer.

The manual labor comes in the form of their production of altar breads, which is their main source of income. Each year, they supply about 13 million breads to churches across the nation.

The nuns living at the Valley of Our Lady monastery are the only community of the Order of Cistercians (not to be confused with the Order of Cistercians of Strict Observance) in the United States*. There are about 750 Cistercian nuns globally, and about 1,600 Cistercian monks.

Even though the nuns are cloistered, Sister Bede said the monastery project is just a different facet of spreading God's word: God's light shines out through their prayer and simple lifestyle, even if it's rarely visible to themselves. The new monastery, the sisters say, will be a physical representation of that light.

"Of course, that's part of the challenge, too — that none of this is about us," Bede said. "It's God in all of this. It's not us."

This article has been updated to clarify which Cistercian order this statement refers to.*

Dan Stockman is national correspondent for Global Sisters Report. His email address is dstockman@ncronline.org. Follow him [on Twitter or on Facebook.]

Advertisement