"Ode to the Artichoke"

by Pablo Neruda

The tender-hearted
upright
artichoke girded itself as a warrior, constructed
a small dome,
to keep itself
waterproof
within its scales.

...

and then one day
it was into the grand
willow basket
with the others and off to the market
it marched

to fulfill its dream:

the militia!

In columns

never more martial

than at the fair,

men

in their white shirts

among the vegetables

became

field marshals

of the artichokes,

the closed ranks,

the voices of command,

and the sudden detonation

of ... a fumbled cashbox,

but

then

comes

Maria

with her basket,

who fearlessly

picks out

an artichoke,
looking at it, examining it against the light as if it were an egg, she buys it,
drops it
into her basket
with a pair of shoes,
a white cabbage and a bottle
of vinegar as well
then
entering the kitchen
plunges it into the pot.
And so it ends,
in peace,
the career
of the armored vegetable called 'artichoke,'
and presently
scale by scale
we undress
this delight

we munch

the peaceful paste

of its green heart.

The artichoke reminds us of the gospel call to be broken as food for others. How do you feel called to do that today?

PRAY

Write, or compose in your head, a short ode to a type of food that you appreciate.
