

Ministry
Social Justice

Cindy Wooden

View Author Profile

Catholic News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Rome — June 23, 2020

Share on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

Women religious working "on the front lines," exposed to the coronavirus yet continuing to care for abandoned children, working to alleviate poverty, providing health care and helping victims of human trafficking are not "super women," said Comboni Sister Alicia Vacas.

Instead, they are women with great faith, compassion, generosity and determination, she said, "but also very vulnerable women, sometimes exhausted, most of the time powerless because they are burdened with the brokenness of their people."

"What I love most about them is that they are resilient mothers; they really believe that life is stronger than death," Vacas told an online symposium June 23.

The symposium, "Women Religious on the Frontlines," was sponsored by the U.S. and British embassies to the Holy See and focused on how the COVID-19 pandemic was impacting the sisters and the communities where they minister.

Vacas, a nurse and the Jerusalem-based Middle East provincial superior of the Comboni Sisters, volunteered with other sisters to go to Bergamo, Italy, in early March to care for the mostly elderly sisters living in the order's convent there.

Forty-five of the convent's 60 residents tested positive for the coronavirus and, eventually 10 died. Most of the staff was infected as well, Vacas said, so the house was in "chaos," without anyone to nurse the sick, cook, clean or do laundry.

And because the convent was not officially a nursing home, she said, when she arrived, they had no personal protective equipment. But other communities of sisters — from different orders and from as far away as Hong Kong — sent masks and gowns and gloves, "making this a wonderful experience of sharing."

Spending Lent and Holy Week literally in the midst of the pandemic — "this process of real cross, passion and resurrection" — was an experience of faith, she said. "I think that being part from the inside of this tragedy that humanity is facing right now is a gift from God."

While the situation in Italy has improved, she said, sisters in the Middle East and Africa who run hospitals and clinics are still in danger; they accept patients who may have the virus, but many times they have no protective equipment, no tests and few lay doctors and nurses because of the lockdown orders.

"Tragically, this pandemic has caused vast unemployment, poverty and food insecurity, further challenging the work of women religious," said Callista Gingrich, U.S. ambassador to the Holy See.

The works of the sisters "are endlessly agile," said Sally Axworthy, British ambassador to the Holy See. The sisters see and need and respond; "they are resilient, staying in conflict zones for example, even when that is at risk for themselves. We welcome their leadership. We recognize that they are uniquely well placed to build relationships of trust with those who have been exploited or abused."

Sr. Stan Therese Mumuni, founder and superior of the Marian Sisters for Eucharistic Love in Ghana, began her order to rescue and care for unwanted children, many of whom could have been killed because of local beliefs that physical and mental disabilities and sometimes even twin births are a bad omen or bring bad luck to the village.

When the lockdown began, she said, the special schools where the blind or hearing-impaired children were boarding called and told her she had to pick them up. Suddenly, she had many more mouths to feed and prices at the market "shot up."

The lockdown also means more children are in danger of being trafficked for cheap labor because their families cannot afford to feed them, she said.

Loreto Sister Imelda Poole, the Albania-based president of Religious in Europe Networking Against Trafficking and Exploitation, gave the same warning.

The "massive explosion of poverty" because of the pandemic places thousands of young people, particularly young women, at risk of being trafficked, she said, "because these are the people — the vulnerable — that the traffickers go after."

And, she said, while moving the work of RENATE online during the pandemic has made it possible for the sisters to continue counseling people rescued from traffickers and to expand their advocacy and education programs, she also warned that with children spending more time online, they are "incredibly more vulnerable to sexual exploitation online."

Advertisement