

News
Social Justice
Migration

Mercy Sr. Terry Saetta, far left, and Mercy Sr. Patricia Mulderick, far right, pose May 7 at the respite center in McAllen, Texas, where they volunteered to help migrants. (CNS/Courtesy of the Sisters of Mercy)

Rhina Guidos

View Author Profile

Catholic News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

May 21, 2021

Share on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

In early May, the Leadership Conference of Women Religious asked members for urgent help in ministering to migrants when families, minors and others were increasingly coming across cities and towns close to the U.S.-Mexico border.

Sr. Patricia Mulderick of the Sisters of Mercy, who'd had previous experience in advocacy work on behalf of migrants and experience in Latin America, was one of several women religious who answered the call.

One of the places she chose to volunteer was the respite center run by Catholic Charities of the Rio Grande Valley in McAllen, Texas, a type of ground-zero in the current immigration debate, which has been the backdrop for welcome as well as rejection of migrants cutting across the nearby border.

"As Sisters of Mercy, we joined with volunteers from all over the USA, religious and lay, who come to be that welcoming presence for those who are tired, poor and yearning at the Mexican-American border," Mulderick wrote in a joint letter with Mercy Sr. Terry Saetta, who also volunteered at the center in May.

Handing out clothes, food and sometimes just providing a friendly ear, the sisters put into action one of the main missions of LCWR, the largest organization for women religious in the country: "to collaboratively carry out their service of leadership to further the mission of the Gospel in today's world."

Working side by side with members of other congregations, the sisters formed a community of their own, one in which they could discuss with other women religious themes related to immigration even after they left the region.

"You're really doing community service together," Mulderick said. "So, you bond quickly."

They worked Sisters of St. Joseph, Dominican sisters, Franciscan sisters, among others, but "all coming to volunteer, it's kind of you're all in this together," Mulderick said.

Advertisement

Even in tough moments, when some of them witnessed the hardship of migrants who had arrived damp after the river crossing, confused or just needing basics to survive, the experience affected some of the sisters more than others.

The community of women religious, though from different orders, helped "create camaraderie," collaboration, and a sense of empathy and support for those who hadn't before handled situations such as the one they witnessed and sometimes brought with it tears, Mulderick said.

Along with Saetta, Mulderick wrote down impressions and sights and sounds they experienced in their time at the respite center.

"As these people from many different countries walk through the Respite Center's many doors, they stop at security to get their temperatures and credentials checked," they wrote. "One room is filled with chairs of people clutching their documents and waiting to be helped regarding the next leg of their journey.

"Tired and anxious, yet somewhat relieved. Young children run around, some in bare feet and diapers until they can get other clothes donated by generous people wanting to help in some way. Like salve for body and soul! They get shampoo, soap and other essentials ... also donated by others."

In a May 19 interview with Catholic News Service, Mulderick said something as simple as giving someone a toothbrush elicited a hug and tears from one of the migrants.

"I thought, you know, there's something more essential here than the little things that are in this bag. It was the welcome," she said. "And so, the center I think, the respite center, is so well named because it's this respite in between the long journey to the States."

The help that the sisters were able to provide the migrants, she said, wasn't to solve their problems, whatever those might be, but just to be with them in a particular moment.

"It's just being with people in their most vulnerable moment," Mulderick told CNS. "Maybe they've been weeks or months or a year in those camps in Mexico ... so they just finally come to a place where someone says 'welcome.' "

In the evenings, the Mercy sisters gathered to pray by name for those they had met and talked about their experiences with the migrants.

Out of those discussions, they got the idea to print out cards in Spanish that said, "Remember, you're special. God is with you," as well as, "Have courage, keep going. Don't be afraid. I'm with you on this journey."

Mulderick said she was aware that even some Catholics wouldn't agree with the work of helping migrants, but that for those occasions, she keeps a message on her dresser that says: "No matter what the question, love is the answer."

"I think that goes with Jesus' command to love one another as we have been loved," she said. "You welcome me when you welcome the least of my brothers and sisters. I don't know how much clearer that can get. I mean, we can all disagree with policy but when you stare in the face of people, flesh and blood, love is the only answer. Rejection is for me not an option."