ROME — Two of Pope Francis' most regular contacts have tested positive for COVID-19, the Holy See press office confirmed on Jan. 18.

The Vatican's secretary of state, Italian Cardinal Pietro Parolin, and Venezuelan Archbishop Edgar Peña Parra, substitute secretary for general affairs in the Secretariat of State, are both in isolation after testing positive for the coronavirus in recent days.

Parolin, 67, is said to be experiencing "very mild" symptoms, while Peña Parra, 61, is asymptomatic. Both are believed to be fully vaccinated and boosted.

Earlier this month, the Vatican tightened its COVID-19 regulations and now requires mandatory vaccinations and boosters for its employees. The Vatican said the new measures came in response to "the progressive worsening of the health emergency."

The number of COVID-19 cases have risen dramatically in Italy in recent weeks. In order to enter any of the offices of Vatican city-state, proof of vaccination is required for visitors and employees alike.

At the time of publication, the Vatican press office has not responded to an inquiry as to the last time either Parolin or Peña Parra were in contact with Pope Francis.
