

News
Analysis

Bishop Peter Baldacchino of Las Cruces, N.M.; Archbishop Gustavo García-Siller of San Antonio; Bishop Mark Seitz of El Paso, Texas; and Archbishop John Wester of Santa Fe, N.M., lead a march in El Paso March 24, 2025, against mass deportations by the U.S. government. (OSV News/Bob Roller)

Heidi Schlumpf

View Author Profile

Follow on Twitter at @heidischlumpf

Religion News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

July 23, 2025

Share on BlueskyShare on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

Katie Holler has watched with horror as migrants in the United States have been violently detained, some separated from their families and children. The case of a Cuban mother deported without her still-nursing baby especially anguished Holler, a Catholic and the mom of two young children herself.

Read this next: Miami archbishop joins Knights on Bikes to pray for clergy access to Alligator Alcatraz

" I have a 6-month-old baby. How distressing that would be to me as a mother to be separated from a baby I'm breastfeeding," said Holler, a social worker who lives in Steubenville, Ohio. "These are vulnerable people, people we as Catholics say we love and want to support, and yet this administration is doing the exact opposite of what our faith demands us to do."

Even more frightening for Holler has been the rise of authoritarianism under Donald Trump, which she sees some of her fellow Catholics shrugging off, or even supporting.

Kate Holler and her family. (Courtesy of Holler)

A few months into the new administration, she decided to do something. With a few social media posts, Holler gathered a group of a dozen or so like-minded Catholic moms to meet online, and in July they took their first action: a letter-writing campaign to U.S. bishops, urging them to speak out publicly and advocate politically for mercy in the treatment of migrants.

"In the spirit of Christ, who Himself was a refugee, I ask you to help lead our local Church in defending the vulnerable and promoting policies that reflect the Gospel as well as Catholic Social Teaching," the sample letter said.

"As a shepherd of the Church, your voice carries moral authority and hope. In light of the Church's teachings on human dignity, the preferential option for the poor, and the call to welcome the stranger, I believe now is the time for bold and courageous leadership in defense of the marginalized," it said.

In just two weeks, more than 150 letters were sent to 75 bishops. At least one response has already arrived from the Indiana Catholic Conference seeking further conversation.

The group named itself the Dorothea Project, in homage to two Catholic women known for being outspoken for justice: Catholic Worker founder Dorothy Day and Sr. Thea Bowman, a Franciscan Sister of Perpetual Adoration who famously called out the U.S. bishops on racism in 1989. Both are on the path to sainthood in the Catholic Church.

"Women have always been at the forefront of the social mission of the church. Women were the ones at the foot of the cross when Jesus was crucified," said Holler. "I always say that moms can act as the moral compass of a society."

Tweet this

Though it started with moms, the group has opened itself to any Catholic woman interested in helping to educate others about Catholic social teaching. In just two months, its email list has grown to nearly 200 people, representing diverse backgrounds, geographical homes and experiences of Catholicism.

"Women have always been at the forefront of the social mission of the church. Women were the ones at the foot of the cross when Jesus was crucified," said Holler. "I always say that moms can act as the moral compass of a society."

Exit polls and more recent voter data indicate increased support for Trump among Catholic voters — including Catholic women — in the 2024 election.

Dorothea Project members want to help turn that tide, and immigration seems to be a key to doing so among members of a U.S. church created by waves of immigrants. While the Catholic Church holds that nations have a right to regulate their borders, it also teaches that people have the right to migrate to sustain their lives and the lives of their families. Church teaching also emphasizes the inherent dignity of all human persons, including migrants.

BreAnna Woznick, who voted for Trump in her first presidential election in 2016 because "that's who Catholics I knew were voting for," was feeling overwhelmed with the current political climate this spring when she discovered the Dorothea Project.

"I was not seeing Catholic values in online Catholic spaces," says Woznick, who lives in Tucson with her husband and one child. Many of the conservative Catholic influencers Woznick followed online seemed more interested in arguing about their faith than living it, she said, and she had struggled with the same behavior. "There seemed to be very little compassion or seeking to understand each other."

The Dorothea Project provided a more positive community and a practical project to start to make a difference. Woznick wrote to her former bishop, Edward Weisenberger, now of Detroit, who recently joined a public protest at an ICE facility to urge more humane practices.

Rachel Mondelli, a mom of two who lives outside Houston, wrote to Galveston-Houston Archbishop Joe Vásquez, who formerly headed the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Committee on Migration. Vásquez has expressed concern about ICE raids, but Mondelli would like to see more. "This isn't a moment when the church can step back and not be bold in defending the vulnerable," she said.

Mondelli has been frustrated with the apparent marriage between Christianity and the Republican Party, especially since the first Trump administration.

"As Catholics, we don't align perfectly with either party," she said. "But it's very difficult for me to square the circle of how many people I know who have a deep faith and are good and decent people and yet are supporting so much of what's happening in our country right now. It seems antithetical to the gospel and who Jesus was."

Migrants seeking asylum in the United States wait for humanitarian assistance and relief at Catholic Charities in McAllen, Texas, Jan. 18, 2025. (AP/Eric Gay)

Mercedes Fratamico, a second-generation Mexican American and a member of the group, said the issue of immigration is personal. "I could have been born on the other side of the border. It's just a matter of luck and circumstances," she said. "My parents are citizens, but I still have a lot of solidarity with the migrant community."

The project is reaching younger women especially — most in their 20s and 30s — who have a common yearning for a community committed to both faith and social justice, something many say is lacking in their own parishes.

"Sometimes it's hard to find the right way to join politics and faith," said Fratamico, a mom of two who works for an engineering design and manufacturing company outside of Philadelphia. "In some political spaces, people have a preconceived notion about religion, and other spaces have a preconceived notion about social justice."

Catholic groups such as Pax Christi and the NETWORK Lobby for Catholic Social Justice have long advocated for Christian values in the public square. But the Dorothea Project's personal invitation online, from an individual or group they trusted, was key for many of these young Catholic women, who felt isolated in their church circles and helpless in the face of growing authoritarianism in the country.

Their experience reflects the findings of religion sociologist Porsia Tunzi, professor of theology and religious studies at Saint Mary's College in Moraga, California, who interviewed 75 Christian women for her doctoral dissertation on how faith and gender plays out online. Three-quarters of them reported forming real connections on social media, specifically Instagram, and almost two-thirds said those connections made them feel less alone.

"This was especially significant among women who felt ostracized, unsafe and/or not accepted in an in-person church community," Tunzi said in a recent email interview. "In other words, women are finding ways to connect and form community online that is deeply meaningful."

Advertisement

Tunzi's research also showed that women want to bridge their faith and politics, but a significant number of them didn't feel represented by pro-Trump rhetoric online from other Christian women content creators or in their church communities, she said.

The Dorothea Project will focus next on parish pastors, encouraging them to take actions of solidarity with immigrants and refugees, Holler said. A recently released study, based on 2022 data, showed that Catholic priests were more likely than leaders in other faith traditions to discuss immigration with their congregations, and they discussed immigration more than nearly all other political issues. The group will also support the growing number of church leaders who are criticizing the administration's mass deportation project, such as the Florida bishops trying to gain pastoral access to people being detained in the Everglades detention center known as "Alligator Alcatraz."

Catholic sisters joined anti-Trump protests over the summer, and some bishops and clergy have begun accompanying migrants to court, where asylum-seekers and others run the risk of being detained even as they pursue legal processes to stay in the country.

That kind of leadership, the project's advocates believe, can have real power, spiritual as well as political. Mondelli said she has noticed that, online and in real life, people have been heartened when church leaders stand up for immigrants. "I'm seeing it open people's hearts to the church in a way I haven't seen in a long time," she said.

This story appears in the Immigration and the Church feature series. View the full series.